Job Growth Stalls in February, Surprising Forecasters

By DAVID LEONHARDT

Job creation all but stalled in February, surprising Wall Street forecasters and making life difficult for President Bush as he begins his re-election campaign.

The economy added just 21,000 jobs last month, the Labor Department reported today, down sharply from January's gain and far below the type of increase that was common in the 1980's and 1990's. The unemployment rate held steady at 5.6 percent, the Labor Department said, mostly because many people have stopped looking for work since last year, removing them from the government's official count of the unemployed.

"This is a disappointment," said Richard D. Roper, chief economist of the Prudential Equity Group. "It shows very sluggish job creation in an economy which by almost all other measures is really doing very well."

The problems showed up in nearly every corner of the labor market. Manufacturers cut jobs for the 43rd consecutive month. Hourly wages for most of the workforce rose just 3 cents, roughly at the rate of inflation. The average length of unemployment increased to 20.3 weeks, its highest level since 1984.
